Such transmitters often incorporate electro-optical modulators, such as LiNdP4O12. The output of a LiNdP4O12 modulator operated at a specified frequency may be varied by changing the drive voltage or drive current applied to the modulator. Transmitters used for radar systems frequently require a beam that is stable and scanable, as is required for example in pulse-Doppler radar systems. In some cases, the beam produced by a single transmitter is only stable for a single orientation of a radar antenna. Thus, beam-forming transmitters may be used to produce a number of beams, each of which may be addressed to a particular position and orientation in space. A beam-forming transmitter is, by definition, a transmitter that is capable of producing radiation on multiple wavelengths, or at least is capable of producing radiation on a mixture of wavelengths that are distinguishable from radiation produced on other wavelengths.From time to time it is necessary to separate the surfaces of a pair of panels of a vehicle body, such as may be required when an old or damaged panel needs to be replaced with a new panel in order to provide a satisfactory appearance. In such cases there is often the need to remove a removable panel, such as a carrier panel, from the body of the vehicle, and there is also a tendency for the panels to be misaligned during the removal operation, as the parts of the assembly being separated are not aligned when they are first joined together. Additionally, if a panel is to be provided with an aperture for allowing access to fasteners or other body parts, there is frequently the need to provide an aperture in a portion of the panel that is not readily accessible to a workman. There are several prior art systems that are directed to one or more of the above problems, and it is apparent that further improvements in such systems would be desirable. For example, U.S. Pat
