Exposure and White Balance You may find that, after using a camera for a while, you don't have to adjust your images for a particular exposure level. However, this is not true for every photographer, and it's pretty easy to mess things up. When taking pictures of things in the outdoors, especially where there's no ambient light, you may want to leave the exposure settings on Auto because you aren't sure what kind of exposure your scene will need. A camera with an exposure mode like Auto will expose the image at the ISO (mechanical sensitivity) setting you have selected. If you then add light to your scene, the image may be underexposed, which means you may need to increase the ISO setting to ensure that you have enough light for a good picture. However, if you change the lighting conditions in your scene or take the picture under artificial light, you will want to change the ISO to a lower number. Figure 5-21, taken with a camera set to ISO 200 and f/10. (Photo by Wolfgang Staudte.)" shows a photo taken with a camera set to ISO 200 and a f/10 focal length with the ambient light exposed. At this setting, the shutter speed is 1/200 second. Figure 5-21. This photo was taken with a camera set to ISO 200 and a f/10 focal length. (Photo by Wolfgang Staudte.) These exposure settings depend on the light conditions in your scene and the ISO setting of the camera. If your camera doesn't have an ISO setting on it, you can change the sensitivity of the camera by moving your ISO dial. Most cameras have an ISO setting in a range of 100–1600, which means that a higher-numbered ISO is generally used in brighter lighting conditions (as described in Figure 5-19). If you shoot outside where the light levels are less than what the camera's sensor can handle, your images may look fine when you download them to your computer, but when you print them, you may notice that they are underexposed (meaning the highlights are under exposed). To fix this problem, you can use the White Balance feature to alter the color balance of your images so that they come out as you had intended them to look. This is most common when you are shooting images

Chemoselective 1,4-addition of olefins to aryl 1,4-dienones: stereodivergent synthesis of 3-aryl-2-pyrrolidinones. The first Chemo-1,4-addition of readily available chiral olefins to aryl 1,4-dienones is reported. The diverse range of possible 1,4-additions is demonstrated, and a novel method to attain complete diastereocontrol in the 1,4-addition/1,2-elimination step is reported. The reaction provides 1,4-addition to afford stereodivergent 3-aryl-2-pyrrolidinones in good yields and with excellent stereocontrol of the regio- and diastereoselectivity. [reaction: see text]Efficacy of Tetrahydrobiopterin as a Frontline Treatment in Patients with Neuropsychiatric Symptoms of Parkinson's Disease. Current antiparkinsonian drugs do not treat the parkinsonian motor symptoms adequately. There is increasing evidence that neuropsychiatric symptoms such as depression, anxiety, and psychotic symptoms present in patients with Parkinson's disease (PD) are related to low levels of dopamine in the brain. Tetrahydrobiopterin (BH4) is a cofactor of the tyrosine hydroxylase, the rate-limiting enzyme in dopamine synthesis, and has a direct and indirect effect of dopamine release through interacting with the glutamatergic system. BH4 has been shown to be able to ameliorate depression and psychosis in patients with depression and schizophrenia, respectively. This study aims to evaluate the efficacy of BH4 on neuropsychiatric symptoms of PD with low catecholamines in a randomized, placebo-controlled double-blind trial. Patients with PD receiving conventional antiparkinsonian drugs (n = 27) and experiencing at least 2 out of 4 neuropsychiatric symptoms were included. Patients were randomly assigned (n = 15) to 3 months of daily intervention with BH4 (20 mg) or matching placebo (n = 12). We evaluated the changes in neuropsychiatric symptoms using the Unified Parkinson's Disease Rating Scale and the Neuropsychiatric Inventory questionnaire. The BH4 group had a significant improvement in Parkinson's Disease Questionnaire-8 total score, neuropsychiatric inventory total score, and agitation/distress score. This
